FRAUD PREVENTION FOR SENIORS: WHAT YOU NEED TO KNOW

NEVER EVER

June is World Elder Abuse Awareness Month, and the Elder Justice Coordinating Council, is spreading the word about imposter scams which frequently target the elderly.

These imposter scammers lie and pretend to be someone they're not. Their goal? Trick you into giving them money, access to your accounts, or your personal information. They make up complicated stories about emergencies so you'll panic and act quickly before you have time to think about what to do or talk to someone you trust.

Always stop and talk to someone you trust if you're worried about a problem with your account or identity — especially if the stranger says they're from the government or the situation is serious or involves a crime.

One common scam starts with an unexpected call from someone who says there's suspicious activity on your account.

To "help" you, they transfer you to someone who says they're from the government. This so-called helper, who claims to be from the FBI, the FTC, or some other law enforcement agency, urges you to move your money to "protect it". But it's all a lie. No one from the government will ever ask you to do these things. Only scammers will.

Other lies might involve a "suspended Social Security number" or supposed eligibility for government benefits. They may use a fake caller ID or official-looking letters, for example. The agency name might be real or made up (but real-sounding), and some scammers might show you an employee ID or badge — all to seem more real. But they're not.

To recognize and avoid a government imposter, keep these things in mind:

- Never ever will someone from the government say: "Your money isn't safe. Move it to protect it." Only a scammer will.
- Never ever will someone from the government threaten to suspend your government benefits if you don't pay immediately. Only a scammer will.
- Never ever will someone from the government demand that you pay with a payment app, cryptocurrency, wire transfer, or gift cards. — maybe by transferring it to an account they give you, depositing it in a "government account" or crypto ATM for "safekeeping," or getting cash or gold and giving it to a courier.

If you, or a friend or relative spot an imposter scam — or any other type of scam — report it at ReportFraud.ftc.gov.
